Affirmative consent curriculum

In recent years, 38 states and the District of Columbia have been enacting new sex education laws, specifically strengthening requirements for inclusion of LGBTQ+ students and instruction on dating and prevention of sexual violence and healthy relationships. Requiring consent education has been one of the main trends, driven by a growing cultural awareness of the importance of sexual consent. The aim of this education is to promote healthy sexuality for young people by helping them understand consent as affirmative and genuinely voluntary. Lawmakers in eight states and the District of Columbia have promoted that goal by requiring school sex education to cover consent. Seven of these requests were enacted in 2016 or later, including four in 2019. Consent for the state powers of legislators differs significantly in whether and how consent is defined. California, Delaware, Oregon and South Carolina appoint either consent or affirmative consent as part of their sexual education requirements, but offer limited details. By contrast, Colorado, Illinois, Maryland, New Jersey and the District of Columbia provide more detailed definitions of consent to teaching schools. Illinois this year enacted a particularly strong measure requiring age-appropriate consent education and clarifies that consent must be given freely and can be withdrawn, is not implied by consent to a prior activity or with another person, and cannot be given by a person who is intoxicated or asleep. Lawmakers have caught on to the trend of consent education from a growing public conversation about gender-based violence, including the Me Too movement and the advancement of student advocates of the affirmative standard of consent on college campuses. Experts agree: Professional organizations including the American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists and the American Academy of Pediatrics support the inclusion of consent in comprehensive sex education. Consent is covered by the National Standards of Sexuality Education, developed by youth, response and SIECUS advocates: Sex Ed for Social Change to lead the teaching of basic content and skills in sex education. The role of K-12 Schools Consent conversations are important in K-12 education, as schools can reach young people widely and in the formative stage of development, before students start having sex or forming beliefs about sex. Schools plant seeds of understanding about consent when teaching young children the difference between good touch and bad touch and can raise the idea of consent when covering topics such as relationship and communication skills. According to experts, sex consent education should be a natural continuation of these early lessons, helping students acquire the tools to explore their growing sexuality in a healthy and respectful way. For example, national standards of sex education primary school rejection skills, adding personal boundaries and preventing sexual violence in high school, and discussing sexual consent and respect for sexual boundaries in high school. Most states that require sex education to cover consent apply only to high school and high school classes. However, Oregon's standards begin in elementary school with personal boundaries and then progress across high school and high school to emphasize affirmative consent and teach skills to practice consent and respect the boundaries of others. Opposing the abstinence-only program The movement towards consent education contrasts sharply with what is taught under abstinence-only programs, which have received more than two billion federal dollars since the 1990s and are based on controlling youth behavior. Opponents of abstinence-only programs emphasize that they are ineffective at empowering young people with skills for safer sex. Moreover, these programs often promote rigid gender stereotypes, violate the human right to health information, and exclude consideration by LGBTQ+ students and those who have survived sexual violence. Teaching about consent is key to pushing back against abstinence-only messages and is an important part of comprehensive sex education. When schools teach students how to say no to sex, they also acknowledge young people's ability to say yes. Consent education can signal to young people that sexuality is a normal part of life and dispel misconceptions about sexual violence and gender stereotypes. Consent education is one step that legislators, schools and communities can take to respect young people's right to sexual empowerment and self-determination. Affirmative laws and consent policies are making their way through the states. We're following the Yes movement, which means that through the world.
